

Sexual health is about safety, enjoyment, and respect. It's about caring for yourself in sexual relationships. Factors important to your sexual health include:

- x Healthy, respectful relationships
- x Consensual sexual activity
- x Sexual activity that is comfortable and enjoyable for all parties
- x Minimising un-planned pregnancy and exposure to sexually transmitted infections

Healthy relationships

Healthy relationships are relationships where there is respect, trust, and support for each other. This includes respectful sexual activity, where each person has given informed consent and can expect and receive enjoyment and satisfaction.

What is consent?

Sexual consent is where a person with the cognitive capacity to make the decision voluntarily and freely agrees to sexual activity (this is considered informed consent). It's important that you are 100% sure that the person you're with has the capacity to make the decision and is happy and willing to partake in the sexual activity. Non-consensual sexual activity (even kissing and touching) is against the law.

Drugs and alcohol can affect people's ability to make decisions, including if they want to be sexual with someone else. This means if someone is drunk or under the influence of drugs, they may not be able to give consent.

Going to someone's house is not consent, accepting gifts or favours from someone is not consent, being drunk with someone is not consent, starting something and then changing your mind is not consent.

If you experience non-consensual sexual assault or sexual harassment, visit the JCU Safety Wellbeing page (<https://www.jcu.edu.au/safety-and-wellbeing>) for advice and support.

Unplanned pregnancy

Pregnancy can be unpredictable. You may try to fall pregnant but experience difficulties in doing so. You may avoid becoming pregnant but your contraceptive method fails for one or more reasons. It is important to think about your options for an unplanned pregnancy early.

As soon as you know that you are pregnant, start seeking information and support. Aim to make an informed choice, and consider things early enough so that the widest range of choices is available to you.

Contact your doctor at the first signs of pregnancy. For further information and support you can call:

Protect yourself from sexually transmitted infections

There are a variety of common sexually transmitted infections (STIs). Because they are common it means almost every person you have sex with could have an STI; they are so widespread that anyone can have them. Although many STIs are manageable, some can change your health risks. STIs are not always comfortable and sometimes there is unfounded stigma attached to them. Prevention is always better. Always use

You can be exposed to an STI during any sort of sexual activity – not just penetration. Oral sex, and any skin to skin contact can pass on certain types of STIs. The best protection from sexually transmitted infections are condoms – male or female – and dental dams if a woman is receiving oral sex. These create a barrier to any infections being spread.

Always see a doctor if you think you may have an STI. If you have any concerns or uncertainty about sexual health, assault, or harassment, seek help.

If you are concerned about a friend or family member, look for the signs that something is not OK, talk with them about what's going on, listen to their experience, and seek help together.
